Company Club - consisting of seven men elected to membership by the prisoners and sponsored by the CCF. This club took care of all company matters concerning sports, mess, study groups, sanitation and the library.

did not observe a magazine called the "New Life: however, "New China," "Soviet Union," "National Guardian," "New York Daily Worker," "London Daily Worker, " and the "Shanghai News," were all available to the prisoners.

No newspapers were printed in Camp #1; however, the paper "Towards Truth and Peace" was distributed in Camp #1. ______voluntarily wrote approximately three articles for this paper; one article was on the Korean War, asking for a cease fire. wrote numerous articles for this paper. and (fnu) also wrote articles.

Generally these articles concerned the Korean War, the cessation of hostilities and prisoner exchange. Usually no retribution was given for the writing of these articles; however, PAGE, on one occasion, received a half-carton of cigarettes. JFK Act 6 (3)

Radio Moscow and Radio Peking were heard over the camp public address system. These consisted of news broadcasts and music. No US broadcasts were heard by anyone in the camp.

In 1951 and 1952, all prisoners were required to attend indoctrination lectures, movies, broadcasts and company meetings. These were compulsory political discussions as low as squad level and periodically monitored by the CCF. In the summer of 1952, this program was greatly curtailed, with only occasional compulsory group study. Books, magazines, movies, pictures, charts and personal contacts were used by camp authorities in conducting indoctrination. Books, magazines and movies were the most effective methods employed. Books and magazines were of CCF choice and all contained propaganda material.

Prior to 1952, voluntary study groups were formed by the progressive elements in Camp #1. Each company had a voluntary study group that met at regimental headquarters for meetings. The CCP set aside a room in which the study group would meet during the evenings. When studying, the prisoners would receive tea and cigarettes from the CCF. The composition, as known to as follows:
